The U.S. & European stock markets faced the surprising late move from the Bank of Japan; a monetary policy contrarian made the surprising move to raise interest rates, and the bank is increasing bond purchases to $67 billion. These actions took both investors and global banks by surprise.

We can only wonder why the Bank of Japan chose to act so late in the interest rate cycle, and we think the BoJ folded to the aggressive campaign that most central banks have undertaken, which is in its last legs.

In the U.S., the interest rate increases continue to impact the housing markets, which reported housing starts that fell last month by 7,000 and building permits that also fell by 170,000. All the issues at play made investors take notice and snapped a four-day losing streak hoping that lasts until the end of the year.
